A 33-year-old Quincy man has pled guilty to robbing the TD Bank on Rte 9 in Wellesley last December, then fleeing the scene in the trunk of a getaway car, according to Norfolk District Attorney Michael W. Morrissey.

"Brian Kalil walked into the bank on December 15, 2013 and presented a note demanding money. He walked out with approximately $1,600 in cash and hopped in the trunk of a Ford Focus to flee the scene," District Attorney Michael W. Morrissey said.

Kalil was identified by several people through bank surveillance video. "Police were at his door in Quincy four days later, with a search warrant in hand for the premises," District Attorney Morrissey said. "He refused to come out of the attic area where he had secreted himself for roughly 9 hours before being flushed out by a police dog."

In addition to finding the defendant, officers located a Burberry scarf hanging in Kalil's closet and a set of leather gloves that appear to be those worn in the robbery, as well as $631.00 in cash.

"Assistant District Attorney Craig Kowalski asked for a state prison term of 4 to 6 years, and that was ordered by Judge Kenneth J. Fishman on September 15, 2014" District Attorney Morrissey said. "Wellesley PD put together a nice package of evidence, which likely helped shape Mr. Kalil's decision to admit his guilt."

Kalil's girlfriend, Nancy Mathieu of Quincy, has been indicted as the getaway driver. Her case remains pending and she enjoys the constitutional presumption of innocence.
