ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The Massachusetts Commission on the Status of Women would like to acknowledge the many individuals who volunteered their time and effort to contribute to this project. Special thanks go to Tufts University student Alanna Tuller, who rewrote and edited the 2006 edition of this handbook, along with XX of the XX Commission, XX of the XX Commission, and XX of the XX Commission for their assistance in editing this project. Finally, we thank the courageous individuals who have chosen to begin a women's commission as well as those who are already part of a commission. Your efforts continue to have a positive impact on women throughout the United States.

This guide is based on an original document developed in 1983 by the Nebraska Commission on the Status of Women and the Lincoln-Lancaster (NE) Commission on the Status of Women specifically for the National Association of Commissions for Women (NACW). NACW has granted permission for Massachusetts Commission on the Status of Women to use the original guide as a basis for publication.

Introduction

“I wonder whether, in our society, women have the chance to use their powers, their full powers, intellectual powers, emotional powers, and all the rest, along the lines of excellence.”

-- John F. Kennedy, 1963

When John F. Kennedy established the Presidential Commission on the Status of Women in 1961, he charged Chairwoman Eleanor Roosevelt with the responsibility of assessing the economic and social status of women in the United States at that time. Their research yielded The Presidential Report on American Women, a publication which raised awareness about the discrimination and sexism American women experienced in most areas of their lives. The report also brought to light the inequalities between women and men in the political, legal, and civil sectors, finally placing the plight of women at the forefront of the American psyche.

After the Presidential Commission dissolved in 1963 The National Association of Commissions for Women (NACW) formed to take its place. Though the NACW still acts as a resource for approximately 220 state, county and city commissions throughout the United States, President Kennedy’s musings about women’s powers still generate important questions to consider when forming a commission. How do women use their different powers to achieve excellence in the community? Are there structures which prevent women from exercising this power? Identifying these obstacles will reveal where the commission is needed most and determine the role it will play in the community.

Before addressing the more concrete aspects of establishing a commission, it is important to truly consider what the purpose of your commission will be and how you will accomplish that goal. A commission has the potential to serve as a forum for political advocacy, to provide the opportunity to liaise with other women’s organizations, to empower women who do not have the agency to advocate for themselves, and to recognize and promote the accomplishments of strong women in the community. Women’s commissions have the potential to affect great social change, and we hope you take full advantage of this opportunity.

While this handbook can certainly serve as a guide for a commission’s establishment, by no means is it a rulebook. Tailor the commission to the women around you and do not be afraid to stray from the precedent if it means improving the lives of the women in your community. On behalf of the Massachusetts Commission on the Status of Women, we wish you the best of luck with your commission and remind you that we, along with the NACW and all other women’s commissions, are here as a resource should you have any questions or want any guidance or support.

Creating a New Commission: The Legislative Process

Commission Models

The first step to establishing a commission is to decide what level of government will be the most appropriate platform for the causes to be addressed by the commission. Commissions can be established on the city, county and state levels depending on the group of women which will benefit from the commission's efforts. Furthermore there are two basic, but not exclusive, models for establishing commissions which differ slightly in terms of organization:

1. A commission can be established by an executive order, legislative order, or with a statute. Commissioners have final authority and staff members report to the commissioners.
2. The executive or legislative branch of government elects an executive director for the commission, who is held responsible to the electing branch of government. The director makes decisions for the commission with final authority, while commissioners exercise lesser authority and advise the director.

Working with Elected Officials

Whether a commission is established with an executive order, legislative order, or by executive or legislative appointment, creating personal connections with elected officials is the most effective way to gain support for the commission. Speak directly with local politicians and demonstrate how the community will benefit from a women's commission and what specific issues need to be addressed. At this stage it will be helpful to draft a clear, concise mission statement which can be shared with elected officials and supporters.

It will also be important to stay in touch with any contacts that have been made in the government. When it is time to select commissioners, the appointing authorities will want to have an idea of the commission's work and future goals in order to better select commissioners who fit well with the mission. Appointment duties can be the responsibility of one elected official, such as the mayor or governor, can be divided among multiple individuals including Senate or House majority leaders, city councilors or women's legislative caucuses.

Finally, it is strongly recommended that the commission's funding or funding opportunity is secured through the enabling legislation. Though it is possible to function exclusively on fundraising, commissions which receive the government's financial backing are better equipped to implement projects and programs because of their guaranteed resources. Additionally, a fixed budget will provide the funds to hire permanent staff members who will be an invaluable resource to the organization.

See Appendix A for a sample State Enabling Legislation.

See Appendix B for a sample County Enabling Legislation.

See Appendix C for a sample City Enabling Legislation.

Selecting and Training Your Commissioners

The specific number of commissioners and corresponding appointing authorities should be described in the commission's enabling legislation. After the legislation has been enacted the appointing authorities or establishing body should solicit applications from potential commissioners. Once the applications have been received it is the appointing authorities' responsibility to review the candidates and appoint the appropriate number of commissioners. The commissioners can then officially be sworn in, an event which also presents an important opportunity to generate press about the new commission.

Commissions can also contribute to the selection process if effective outreach strategies are used to connect with potential commissioners. Establish contact with possible candidates throughout the year by providing volunteer opportunities for non-commission members, asking staff or current commissioners for recommendations, contacting women's organizations or other women's commissions, and talking to professionals whose work is related to that of the commission.

Furthermore, it is important to have a diverse group of commissioners. Pay attention to the age, sex, race, interests and knowledge of candidates during the selection process and compose a commission which represents a cross-section of your community. Another factor to consider is the variety of the commissioners' professional skills. A wide range of skills will contribute positively to the organization especially if the commissioners are knowledgeable in areas such as budgeting and finance, education, legal rights, media, or politics.

Training the newly appointed commissioners will also be an important part of the establishment process. When planning a commissioner orientation remember to emphasize themes such as leadership skills, team building, communication, and the respectful and sensitive treatment of all members and issues addressed by the commission. Provide everyone with a new commissioner manual, which will also serve as a guide for the orientation. The manual should cover, at a minimum, the following topics to ensure that all new commissioners understand their roles and responsibilities to the commission:

1. Overview of the commission and mission statement
2. History
3. Legislation (establishing act and bylaws)
4. Commission structure
5. Commissioner and appointing authorities contact information
6. Swearing-in policy
7. Calendar and meeting schedule
8. Registration and commitment forms
9. Budget and reimbursement policies
10. Office organization and procedures
11. Program and event planning

If it is not included in the establishing legislation, create a membership policy to discuss at the new commissioner orientation. Successful membership policies pay attention to the length of service, reappointment procedures, measures for the rotation of commissioners and committees, and commissioner evaluation. These policies will ensure that commissioners clearly understand their responsibilities to the organization and the weight carried by their appointments.

Orientation also presents a good opportunity to gather basic information for each commissioner's file. Ask the commissioners to bring a resume or a curriculum vitae, and if these are unavailable create a form to get information about each commissioner's educational background, volunteer positions, civic involvement, professional experience, special interests and skills, and contact information.

See Appendix D for a sample Commissioner Application Packet.

Bylaws

One of the first tasks for a new commission is to draft a set of bylaws, which are the codes and regulations by which the commission will be governed. Researching examples of bylaws in a local library or on the internet will help commissioners to begin thinking about how to draft a new set of bylaws. Be sure to consider the following themes when discussing the bylaws with the commission:

1. Authority and leadership positions
2. Definition and process of membership
3. Officers, staff and committees
4. Structure and frequency of meetings
5. Budget
6. Processes to amend the bylaws

If possible, seek legal counsel and receive the approval of all commissioners before officially accepting your bylaws. Furthermore, the bylaws are a living document and should be reviewed regularly to ensure they are still consistent with the commission's vision and goals.

See Appendix E for a sample set of bylaws.

Commission Structure

Different leadership positions and committees exist within each commission to distribute responsibilities between commissioners and staff members.

Officers

One of the commission's first responsibilities as a new organization will be to elect commission officers. The positions typically created include chair, vice-chair, treasurer and secretary, and the length of the term to be served should be predetermined by the commission. It is also important to consider the candidates' leadership qualities and commitment to the organization. Officers should also be willing to take on responsibilities, exercise authority, help with the long and short term planning of the commission, organize the efforts of others, and communicate effectively. Should an officer fail to fulfill these requirements, create a standard procedure for removing and replacing that officer. Clearly explaining the expectations and responsibilities of each position should prevent the need to dismiss any commissioners in a leadership position.

Staff

If the commission is supported by permanent funding, an operating budget should be created which will be managed by the director. In addition to overseeing the budget the executive director may also contribute to strategic planning, coordinate commission events, supervise other hired staff or volunteers working in the office, organize and participate in advocacy efforts, and schedule the commission's meetings.

Interns and Volunteers

Interns and volunteers are an excellent resource and allow for connections to be created between the commissioners and other women in the community. Having interns work alongside the executive director, staff and commissioners will help to develop the interns' understanding of women's issues and provide a platform to address these issues directly. Interns can be undergraduate, graduate or post-graduate students who come from a variety of academic backgrounds to contribute to the overall mission of the commission.

Volunteers are also an important part of the commission's workforce, particularly for their ability to contribute to the commission on an ad hoc basis and act as liaisons between the commission and the women they serve. Even if volunteers have not been appointed as commissioners, include their perspective by inviting them to serve on a planning committee or help with some of the commission's events.

Committees

Creating committees to carry out specific projects may help the commission to run more smoothly and efficiently. Commissioners should join committees based on the specific skills or interests they have to ensure that everyone in the committee is passionate about furthering the same cause. We suggest the creation of the following committees:

1. Budget and Finance
2. Legislative
3. Outreach and Education
4. Communication
5. Advocacy and Special Events
6. Projects and Planning

Working in smaller groups also allows commissioners to cultivate their leadership skills, which can be useful for developing future officers and can make each member of the commission feel as if she or he is contributing directly to the organization. Committee meetings also provide an informal environment for brainstorming creative ideas and solutions to problems faced by the commission and allow commissioners to work as a team for the betterment of the commission specifically and women in general.

II.

Funding Sources: How to Finance Your Commission

Obtaining Funding and Creating a Budget

If possible commissions should secure funding through their establishing legislation because it guarantees the ability to finance new projects, host events, and hire staff with steady funds. Staff members who have spent some time with the commission will have a better idea of how to plan the budget each year. Consider the following expenditures when deciding how to distribute the commission's funding, especially if the commission is relatively new:

1. Salary
2. Travel Reimbursement
3. Office Supplies
4. Special Events and Hearings
5. Internet and Website Services
6. Printing Services
7. Postage

Funding can be obtained in a variety of ways, and we encourage you to explore as many of these avenues as possible. Also keep in mind that different kinds of fundraising can help with both long and short term goals, ensuring that your commission will always have the means to execute the projects, events, and programs you wish to sponsor.

Forming a Nonprofit or “Friends of the Commission” Organization

It is often challenging for government funded agencies and commissions to secure corporate funding because they lack 501(c)(3) status, whereas nonprofit agencies are eligible receive such funding. According to the Foundation Center, an organization which educates the public about philanthropy, an effective nonprofit organization “has the ability to fulfill its mission through a blend of sound management, strong governance, and a persistent rededication to achieving results.” The process of creating a nonprofit organization is similar to that of forming a commission and begins with filing a certificate of incorporation.

First, draft a certificate or articles of incorporation and file this document with the office of the Secretary of State or Attorney General, depending on the protocol for the commission's location. The next step will be to choose a board of directors who will govern the organization. Board members should have a vested interest in the commission's goals, be able to work as part of a team and have connections with people who can make financial contributions to the organization. Once selected the board can also help to compose the commission's mission statement and decide the course of the organization's future.

Similar to establishing a commission, a set of bylaws should be created next with input from the nonprofit's members. After the bylaws have been approved, bank accounts can be set up for the organization by requesting an employer identification number (EIN), also known as a federal tax identification number, after filing paperwork with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). This step usually takes no more than one month and there is no fee to obtain this number.

Once the commission has received an EIN it can file for federal tax-exempt status under Section 501(c)(3) with the IRS. This status will be granted three to six months after filing the paperwork and it is recommended an attorney or lawyer is hired to provide legal counsel and to guide the commission through this process. Because the commission might not have the financial resources to afford legal advice, research organizations which can provide contact information for lawyers who will volunteer their services. After gaining federal tax-exempt status, some states also require nonprofits to file separately for state and local tax exemptions.

Finally, create a plan to fundraise from diverse sources to guarantee as many opportunities as possible to bolster the commission's financial resources. The following sections describe some different methods of raising money for your nonprofit. These strategies can be used to fundraise outside the context of a nonprofit organization as well if you choose not to add a nonprofit to your commission.

Direct Mail

Direct mail campaigns can be a useful tool for the commission because they target a specific group which will, if selected appropriately, respond positively to requests for donations. A commissioner or volunteer with advertising experience should spearhead the campaign and tailor it to the group which will be targeting. It is possible to purchase address lists based on a variety of criteria including resident lists, business lists and political party member lists. Focusing the fundraising campaign on a specific audience will generate positive feedback and, hopefully, the funds needed to finance some of the commission's activities. It is also important to keep all mailing lists up to date to ensure that the commission's time and money are being spent sending mailings to accurate addresses.

Corporate Funding

Many corporations provide support to nonprofit organizations through private foundations, direct giving programs, or a combination of the two. Corporate-sponsored foundations are separate legal entities which are closely tied to the corporation, whereas direct-giving programs are not separate from the corporation itself. A major incentive for corporations to donate is that direct-giving programs permit deductions of up to ten percent on their pre-tax incomes. Either of these options presents the opportunity to partner with a well-established corporation that can provide a steady source of funding to the commission.

Grants

Grants typically fall into the three categories of private, federal, or state funds. To receive a private grant the commission can submit a proposal to a private foundation, corporation, private trust, or corporate foundation. Federal and state grants are cash grants, direct loans, or shared revenues awarded by federal and state governments to an organization. All three types of grants typically allow the grantor to specify the conditions under which the funds can be used. Therefore, it is important to select grantors whose interests align closely with those of the commission.

In-Kind Donations

In-kind donations are non-monetary donations in the form of tangible items or services provided by corporations or businesses. This type of donation is good for both short-term planning, such as a business which donates the refreshments for a one-time event, as well as long-term planning if the commission establishes strong connections with businesses which support its mission.

Special Fundraising Events

While special events can present an initial investment, they are ultimately worth it for the connections forged between the commission and event attendees in addition to any monetary donations collected at the event. Fundraising events might focus on generating funds immediately or, with an eye towards the future, emphasize networking and forming connections with potential funding sources. At the event, provide guests with a clear explanation of how their donations will help to further the commission's vision and be sure to follow up with attendees after the event to guarantee future donations.

Planned Gifts

Planned gifts refer to a donor's decision to appropriate funds for an organization which are to be donated after her or his death. Legally, a planned gift must be provided in some form while the donor is alive but the principal benefits do not accrue until the donor's passing or the passing of her or his income beneficiaries. Planned gifts provide the funds for long-range planning and are an excellent asset for projects the commission might wish to execute in the future.

III.

Organization and Operations

Creating an Annual Calendar

It is recommended that staff, commissioners, and interns should compile a calendar of all the commission's meetings and events for the next fiscal year. Choosing a consistent meeting time for each committee can be one of the most helpful decisions when creating the calendar. For example, the Executive Committee might meet the third Wednesday every month while the Legislative and Public Policy Committee will meet the second Wednesday every month. Providing a consistent meeting day will guarantee a greater rate of attendance at meetings.

It is also helpful to consider including the following meetings and events when planning your calendar:

1. Full Commission Meetings
2. Committee Meetings
3. International and National Women's Events, such as Equal Pay Day, Women's History Month, and International Women's Day
4. Planning Sessions
5. Commission Events, such as advocacy days or annual fundraisers
6. Public Hearings
7. New Member Training

When planning the calendar, consider any conflicts which might arise for predetermined meeting days. Take note of federal, state, and religious holidays and be mindful of any commissioners with children whose school calendars could create conflicts. Submit a draft of the calendar to the chair and seek her approval before distributing it to the rest of the commissioners.

Meetings

Meetings are essential to the operation of any commission because they provide the opportunity for commissioners and staff members to work together and assess the status of the commission, brainstorm new ideas, and create solutions to any problems which might arise. Most commissions see a strong partnership between commissioners and staff as they work together to accomplish collective goals. Regular meetings, either in person or via conference call, allow members to establish a close working relationship and create a positive force for both the internal strength and public reputation of the organization. In addition to forging this partnership, perhaps the most important function of commission meetings is the opportunity to plan for future action.

A marker of any commission's success is certainly its ability to have positive, concrete effects on the lives of women in its area of jurisdiction, an act which can be accomplished by anything from advocating for pertinent legislation to honoring strong women in the community. Therefore, the most critical component of any meeting is that ideas are not left behind in the board room but are given life and brought to action to fulfill the commission's vision. To go one step further, consider combining meetings with actions or events such as public hearings or advocacy days.

A few days before a meeting is set to occur, remind commissioners and staff members of the date, time, and location of the meeting. Discuss the issues to be addressed the decisions to be made at the meeting in order to emphasize why their attendance is so important. Assigning tasks to each attendee beforehand will also guarantee the efficiency of the meeting and make them feel directly involved in the planning process.

Creating a clear and informative agenda will also help your meeting to run as smoothly as possible. The agenda should be distributed to all attendees a week prior to the meeting and should be posted in a public location. Obtaining the agenda ahead of time will allow commissioners and staff to be prepared for the discussions and decisions to be made at the meeting, as well as providing a time frame for how long each item will be discussed. On a technical note, the agenda should also include the date, time and location of the meeting and, if possible, the same information for the following meeting. When drafting an agenda, consider including the following items:

1. Roll Call
2. Approval of Previous Meeting Minutes
3. Chair's Report
4. Director / Staff Report
5. Committee Reports
6. Old Business
7. New Business
8. Reminder of Future Meetings and Events

During the meeting the chair will moderate discussion, keep the meeting within time constraints, and encourage the participation of all attendees. The chair should begin by calling the meeting to order and then introducing and welcoming guests and new members. Make sure everyone has an agenda and briefly review it before beginning to provide a foundation for participation. During the course of discussion, have the secretary record minutes of the conversation.

It will also be useful to have a set of rules for the conduct of meetings which will help all members understand the most effective way to voice her or his opinion. Obtaining a copy of Robert's Rules of Order is a good place to start for learning how to make the most of commission meetings. The chair should adjourn the meeting after the entire agenda has been covered and all discussions have reached an appropriate conclusion in the context of the meeting. After the meeting, distribute the minutes as soon as possible to all commissioners, staff members, and guests who attended the meeting, and submit them for the chair's approval. Keep all of the commission's minutes on file for future reference.

IV.

Issue Identification and Advocacy

Identifying Issues: Public Hearings

To make the commission's advocacy work as effective as possible, identify issues which specifically affect women in the community. Holding a public hearing is an excellent way to gain a better understanding of the real obstacles currently confronted by women. These meetings are open to the public and provide individuals with the opportunity to share their concerns with the commission.

Begin planning a few months in advance by securing a location large enough to accommodate the anticipated audience and, if possible, find a space in which the hearing can be held free of charge. Reach out to a variety of individuals and organizations who you would like to see attend the hearing, and consider contacting local organizations, municipal legislators, the commission's appointing authorities, and those who have volunteered with the commission in the past. Send letters to these contacts and post flyers around the town or city in which the hearing will be held, keeping track of the total cost for mailings and flyers. Legislators should be contacted with a phone call a few weeks after the letters are mailed to remind them about the hearing.

In addition to individual contacts, make the event known to a larger audience through local media such as newspapers, radio, and cable access stations. Alert these media outlets of the time, date and location of the hearing by writing a media advisory, press release, or public service announcement and distributing it two weeks before the hearing. Create a flyer to include with the mailing and to post around the community, making sure it is simply designed, easy to read, and contains all the necessary information about the date, time, location and theme of the hearing. And, if there is a budget for advertising, consider creating ads for the main newspaper in each city or town to be served by the hearing.

Also take into account that some cities or towns will have multilingual populations and ads should be translated into those different languages to reach as large of an audience as possible. Additionally, it is worth finding translators to speak at the hearing. Communicate with the contact person at the hearing location to find out more information about the different languages spoken in the region and to see if she or he has any suggestions for places to find translators.

Confirm ahead of time if there is an audio system at the location and, if not, leave enough time to obtain one before the hearing. The entire hearing should be recorded and transcribed for the hearing report, so it is important that the appropriate equipment is available. When the day of the hearing arrives, set up a long table at the front of the room for the commissioners and a smaller table or desk facing the commissioners for those testifying, plus rows of chairs for the audience. Have a sign-in table at the location's entrance, and make sure to add the attendee's names to a contact list later on so they can be informed of future hearings or events in their area.

During the hearing, invite community members to testify before the commissioners and to share their issues or concerns about the status of women in their community, encouraging women from all backgrounds to share their stories to create a dialogue which includes the entire audience. Before attendees leave the hearing, distribute a survey to get feedback about the meeting and to provide women with an opportunity to inform the commission of any issues about which they were not able to testify. After the hearing has finished, combine the survey results and the transcript of the meeting in the hearing report. Additionally, look for any mention of the hearing in local media and contact newspapers which published stories about the hearing and request a copy of the article or print a copy from the newspaper's website.

Send thank you letters to the contact person at the hearing location and to any legislators who attended the event. Within a month of the hearing distribute a hearing report to all attendees, legislators, and other individuals who could benefit from the information learned during the course of the hearing. Public hearings can take a significant amount of planning but done over the course of a few months it is a very manageable process and is a deeply rewarding event when the commission can hear directly from its constituents about the most pertinent issues in their lives.

Advocacy Efforts

It is recommended that the commission organizes an advocacy training session for all commissioners, especially those interested in lobbying on behalf of the commission. Begin with a clear explanation of the overall structure of the legislature including the different leadership positions and the current legislators. Consider bringing in a speaker to advocacy training session who has lobbying experience or a legislator who can share her or his best practices for effective lobbying.

In short, good lobbying comes from familiarity with the legislators and having a clear understanding of the issues at hand. Try to see legislators as allies and enter with the mindset that the commission will be working with, rather than against, her or him. Know her or his past stance on important issues and make sure to follow up with any legislators after a visit. When a legislator takes positive action on the commission's behalf, be sure to thank her or him for supporting the organization.

Another way to strengthen advocacy efforts is to bring together various women's groups to form a coalition which can advocate for women's issues addressed by the commission. Creating a directory of women's organizations to build a network of friends and advocates increases the commission's ability to take action and will provide potential contacts for the caucus. Once a coalition has been established task forces can be created to plan specific actions for the issues on which the commission would like to focus, remembering that sometimes it is better to focus on a smaller, more manageable portion of a larger issue which should be addressed over the course of months or years.

Utilizing the Political System

It is important to understand the political system of the area your commission will be serving so it can be used as much to the commission's advantage as possible. Familiarize staff and commissioners with the local lawmakers and attend events at which they will be speaking, such as candidate nights or forums, to learn about their stances on women's issues. Send legislators questions ahead of time so they can research the issues the commission feels are most pressing for women in the area.

Another method of staying up to date on the current state of important legislation is to hold a forum in which the commission can directly interact with legislators who support the bill. When the legislature is in session, invite a legislator to speak with the commission and interested community members, allotting time for both discussion of the issue and questions and answers. Direct contact with legislators will be essential in making progress on any legislation the commission would like to see passed.

As a government entity which uses its resources for political advocacy, a women's commission has political influence but must use this power intelligently. In the simplest sense, women's commissions exist to give all women a permanent, effective voice and full equality in all areas of their lives. The causes or legislation the commission chooses to support should be non-partisan to ensure that publicly provided resources are being used to help as many women as possible. Finally, keep in mind that while supporting a certain bill or law might be polarizing among legislators, the commission is entrusted with the responsibility to lobby for legislation which promises to improve the quality of life for all women in the community, even if it does split along party lines.

V.

Communication and Outreach: Promoting Your Commission

Spearheading a Public Relations Campaign

The key to a successful public relations campaign is to understand the audience. Targeting a specific demographic will elicit a larger and more positive response, resulting in greater support for the commission. Consider an approach which utilizes different kinds of media to reach the greatest number of people possible.

Consider reaching out to publications which serve special interest groups such as the League of Women Voters, university publications, community groups, and veterans' organizations. Though these publications are small they generally have a strong readership and result in motivated supporters of the commission. Remember that the commission should function as a non-partisan organization which acts in the public's best interest, an approach which will prevent your commission from being too polarizing or making certain members of your audience feel excluded.

Major commission events, such as fundraisers or the induction of new commissioners, will make for the most newsworthy stories. The tone of the story should appropriately reflect the nature of the news source, and if a piece is intended as an exclusive do not offer it to more than one news source. Alert the media early enough so they will time the release of your story to coincide with the event. Prepare a detailed fact sheet, media alert, or press release to distribute to media personnel and agree to be quoted if appropriate.

Print Media

It is very important to consider the audiences of different types of newspapers because the content of a newspaper usually depends on how widely the newspaper is circulated. Larger newspapers are more likely to report matters which reach a wider audience such as the election of officers, new programs, and notable policy actions. Conversely, smaller daily and weekly newspapers are more interested in local news such as the appointment of commissioners or meeting announcements.

Writing a weekly newspaper column is also worth considering especially because newspapers are accustomed to paying for syndicated feature columns and might welcome free articles. Opinion pieces, editorials, and letters to the editor are also useful methods of sharing information about women's issues or upcoming events. If the commission has chosen to work on an ongoing series of articles or editorials, consider meeting with the editorial board of a newspaper to discuss the project.

Remind reporters to attend important events by sending out a media advisory the day before the event, or send a press release to reporters who might not be able to attend. When writing a press release be sure to emphasize the most significant aspect of the story in the first paragraph. The rest of the press release or media advisory should include the "who," "what," "where," "when," and "why" of the event. Provide background information where appropriate but keep the story as concise as possible.

Newsletters are another form of print or electronic media which will benefit any public relations effort and are used to inform the public about the commission's most recent events and accomplishments. General information about the state of women in the city, county, or state served by the commission can also be included and will allow the newsletter to serve as a valuable resource for establishing connections with individuals and organizations which might want to support you in the future.

See Appendix F for a Sample Media Advisory and Appendix G for a Sample Press Release.

Websites and Social Media

Creating an informational, easy-to-navigate website is one of the most important resources for those trying to learn about the work performed by the commission. The ubiquity of the internet means a well-planned website is now more important than ever and will create connections with a far wider audience than any newspaper or television show possibly could. The website should include basic information about the commission, links to other local women's commissions, basic facts about the legislation supported by the commission, a calendar with information about upcoming events and recent publications, especially annual reports.

Social media platforms such as Facebook, Twitter, and LinkedIn are also an effective way to connect with potential supporters. A Facebook page or profile will help the commission to establish a more permanent internet presence and provides the opportunity to record the organization's mission, post pictures, create links to events, and provide updates to other users who view the page. Twitter is more effective for the dissemination of brief announcements or reminders for upcoming events. LinkedIn is similar to Facebook in that it allows the commission to connect with other users, but these interactions emphasize networking and professional interactions rather than the more informal information usually posted on Facebook.

Maintaining a blog is another method of promoting the commission but with greater freedom than the rigid templates of social media platforms. The ability to self-publish in the format of a blog allows for contributions from staff members, commissioners and interns, in addition to providing the flexibility to write posts ranging from summaries of commission events to op-ed style pieces about the status of women in the community.

Radio and Television

Cable television and certain radio shows are also an effective means of reaching a wider audience. Public access programming on cable television is specifically designed to serve the local community and provides an opportunity to reach an audience which has a vested interest in local events. Public service programs offer a more personal approach to media outreach when commissioners or staff members are interviewed about the commission's work or a particular piece of legislation. Another consideration should be public service announcements, which would allow the commission to inform listeners and viewers about a variety of women's issues without having to purchase airtime.

Speakers Bureau

If there are commissioners who enjoy public speaking and would like to donate their time outside of commission meetings, creating a speakers bureau is an excellent way to utilize their talents. Speakers should be well-versed in a few predetermined topics, such as the history of the commission and the most current women's issues, and should be prepared to provide informational talks about these topics when requested to do so. Send a brochure detailing the various topics and the names of the speakers to local and government organizations which might be interested in the topics which will be addressed by the commissioners.

Collateral

Compile a collection of pamphlets and brochures discussing the different causes supported by the commission, the commission's history, and the key pieces of legislation the commission hopes to see passed in the near future. Keep this collateral on hand at any events hosted by the commission and in the office to distribute to visitors. It might also be useful to gather collateral from other women's commissions such as the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor or other similar organizations which might have already put together resources concerning topics of interest for the commission and its constituents.

Chapter VI.
Activities and Events

Planning Events with a Purpose

One of the best ways to connect with supporters and spread the word about the commission is to hold a public event. During the planning stages of any event, remember to ask the commission's efforts will benefit women in the community and if there is anything which can be done to welcome even more women and provide them with the opportunity to gain something from the event. The type of event should reflect the commission's goals and what is hoped to be accomplished by bringing together members of the community.

Types of Events

Fundraisers are a staple event for many commissions. Though fundraisers and auctions are largely held to collect funds for the commission do not overlook the opportunity to create some good press as well. Hold an event which involves all different sectors of the community including speakers or activities which will interest a broad spectrum of individuals. It is a good idea to seek out as many in-kind donations for the event as possible to ensure that the commission is not losing any funds on the event. Catering companies are often willing to donate some food to fundraisers and it might also be able to secure the location for free if it is in a public building. Fundraisers can also be paired with a variety of other events, such as networking or celebration events, to appeal to an even wider audience.

Ceremonies honoring or celebrating individuals and groups in the community are also an important component of the commission's outreach efforts. Consider honoring successful women or girls in the community or celebrating a national event such as Women's History Month or Women's Equality Day. Awareness events are also very worthwhile to organize and will help to spread the word about important issues affecting women in the community, such as domestic violence or the wage gap between women and men. Advocacy days add action to awareness events when individuals who are now aware of a community's most pressing issues lobby, as a group, for the passage of legislation to correct these problems.

If the commission is looking for a more structured event, conferences and symposia are also an effective method of facilitating discussion between individuals and organizations with regards to a specific topic. Conferences and symposia differ from awareness events in that they are often on a much larger scale and require more planning but bring together a greater number of attendees. Networking events are also a good way to gather large crowds, especially to establish professional connections, build coalitions, and to coordinate advocacy efforts. Events specifically coordinated for networking can vary greatly in size, ranging from a roundtable discussion to a larger conference-sized gathering.

Just as fundraisers are easily paired with many events, public relations efforts also mesh well with many of the aforementioned events. It is always a good idea to connect some sort of public relations effort with any commission event because it not only raises further awareness about the issues at hand but also establishes the commission as having a strong community presence.

Event Planning

Depending on the scale of the event planning can begin anywhere from one year to a few months in advance, even if the initial stages are simply brainstorming about the purpose of the event, how many people will attend, creating a planning committee, and what sort of resources are necessary. It will be important to create a budget early in the planning process to guarantee there will be sufficient resources to successfully execute the event. When creating a budget consider that, if nothing will be donated, the commission will have to pay for the site, catering, speakers, technical assistance, invitations and advertisements, in addition to other expenses which might be specific to your event.

The next step will be to select a venue, keeping in mind the type of space which will be most conducive to the event. Public spaces, such as government buildings or community centers, might be able to provide space for the event free of charge if the location is reserved far enough in advance. Some other important venue considerations are the size, location relative to public transportation, the date and time of the event, and if there will be audio and visual equipment available. At this stage, it will also be important to have a rough idea of how many guests will attend so the venue will be guaranteed to accommodate everyone.

For an awards event leave enough time to select and research honorees in advance, especially if the commission is seeking nominations by elected officials or prominent community members. Once the guest list is finalized begin to think about invitations for the event. Request that guests RSVP so the committee can plan for enough space and food to be available during the event. When inviting elected officials seek out those who are most relevant to your event in terms of local, state, or national politics. Provide them with information about the event, and follow up as the event gets closer to remind them of their anticipated attendance.

Around the same time invitations are mailed begin to request donations, both monetary and in-kind, to help finance the event. Caterers, printers, and speakers could all very likely be willing to donate their services. This will also be a good time to begin the public relations campaign for the event. Place ads in local newspapers, utilize social media, and create flyers to post in areas where potential attendees are likely to see them. (For more ideas about public relations, see Chapter IV.)

Finally, begin to search for volunteers early enough so there will be enough time to recruit sufficient help for the event. Contact anyone who has volunteered for the commission in the past and ask them to help recruit more volunteers. Make sure to train the volunteers before the event, providing them with all the information they will need to be as helpful to the attendees as possible. Every event is unique and will require its own specific timeline, but keeping these general planning stages in mind will facilitate a successful and well-coordinated event.

Chapter VII.

Commission Evaluation

Evaluating the Commission

Once the commission has established a presence it is important to take a step back and evaluate how effectively the commission is addressing the needs of women in the community. Yearly evaluations are a good measure of the commission's progress as well as the improvements which need to be made in the future. Furthermore, keeping records of the commission's yearly progress will allow future commissioners to understand the organization's history and how it can be strengthened to serve even more women. The following two sections describe important methods of evaluation which every commission should undertake for a comprehensive review of its work.

Annual Reports

Many commissions are required by their establishing statute, legislation or bylaws to compile an annual report summarizing the commission's accomplishments during the year and its goals for the future. Even if a commission is not required to submit an annual report it is strongly recommended the commission do so because it not only allows for the an internal evaluation of the organization but also results in a concrete document which can be shared with appointing authorities, legislators and community partners. Showing an annual report to these key commission supporters will demonstrate the importance of maintaining a women's commission in the community.

A good place to begin is by assessing the previous year's annual report and deciding which aspects were successful and in which ways the next report can be improved. Additionally, discussing major objectives for the report before beginning to write will allow contributors to understand the big picture. Consider focusing on a specific theme to ensure the report's continuity by emphasizing certain aspects of the commission's work during the year, such as community involvement or new programs initiated by the commission. At a minimum the report should include the following sections to provide a comprehensive picture of the commission's accomplishments and goals:

1. Programs and Activities: Summarizing the events and programs initiated by the commission during the year shows the breadth of the commission's impact on the community. Include summaries of public hearings and brief descriptions of any awards ceremonies, conferences, or other events coordinated by the commission. Such descriptions might also encourage readers to participate in these same events next year, raising even more support for the commission.
2. Research: While it is not necessary to combine any of the commission's research with the annual report it is important to describe, even with a brief summary, how the commission is contributing to the current store of knowledge about the state of women in a specific city, county, or state. Inform readers of the titles of any work published by the commission during the year along with the titles and dates of any research which will be published in the future.
3. Priority Legislation: Include brief descriptions of any bills the commission supports or is tracking and why this legislation is relevant to women, along with the names of legislators who are the bill's lead sponsors. Providing information about the commission's legislative activity allows readers – especially elected officials – to utilize the report as a call to action.

4. Budget: Provide a general overview of the commission's budget including salaries, operating expenses and any other large expenditures made during the year. Demonstrating fiscal responsibility has the potential to increase funding when shown to appointing authorities and legislators who determine funding cuts or increases for the commission.

While these four major areas should provide an idea of what to include in an annual report by no means is it a comprehensive list. Include additional accomplishments, more information about the commission's goals and mission and other updates that will be relevant to readers, legislators, and appointing authorities. Also be sure to create a budget for the report, considering the quantity of reports and the cost of paper and printing. When the report is complete distribute it to all appointing authorities, commissioners, key legislators, other state commission chairs and local women's organizations. Additionally, send copies to the National Association for Commissions on Women (NACW) and the Department of Labor Women's Bureau. Finally, upload the report to the commission's website to share with an even larger audience.

Annual Planning Sessions

Once the annual report has been completed the entire commission should come together to discuss the report and, more generally, to assess the previous year and brainstorm ways to improve the commission during the upcoming year. Because many of the materials presented at the planning session will be long term projects such as the annual report and the yearly calendar, plan enough time to have these projects completed in time for the session. The planning session also presents an opportunity to hold elections for the executive committee and other committee chairs, so be sure to include a ballot in the materials. Also consider including next year's proposed budget, commissioner commitment forms, and commission evaluations if it is necessary to gather concrete feedback from the commissioners regarding the current state of the commission. A standard planning session agenda should include the following:

1. Introduction and Welcome
2. Elections
3. Old Business
4. Review and Planning (discuss events, programs, and hearings)
5. Planning for Next Year (brainstorming, goal setting)
6. Individual Committee Meetings
7. Review of Goals for Next Year
8. Closing Remarks

Holding an annual planning session will allow the commission to evaluate its progress and what still needs to be done for the future. Taking a step back and assessing whether or not the commission is truly meeting its goals and fulfilling its mission statement will allow the organization to work with a clearer focus in the coming year, remembering why they do the work they do and ensuring that their work benefits as many women from as many backgrounds as possible.

Gov. Malloy Signs Lupus Bill; PCSW Asked to Name Advisory Panel Member

HARTFORD – A new bill signed recently by Gov. Dannel Malloy will dramatically help women throughout Connecticut suffering from – and at risk for – lupus, a chronic autoimmune disorder that disproportionately affects women of color.

Public Act No 11-23, An Act Concerning the Establishment of a Lupus Education and Awareness Plan, will establish within the Department of Public Health an inter-agency advisory panel charged with assessing the current state of education on lupus in the state, evaluating educational materials and resources currently available, identifying where improvements can be made and creating a comprehensive lupus awareness and education plan.

The General Assembly's Permanent Commission on the Status of Women (PCSW), which has worked to raise awareness of the condition and testified in favor of the bill, has been authorized to appoint a member to the advisory panel.

“More than 17,000 Connecticut residents are living with lupus, and 90 percent of them are women,” said Teresa Younger, executive director of the PCSW. “And while this is not a uniquely female condition, it does disproportionately affect women; in addition, African-American women are far more likely to have lupus than are white women. Because of racial inequities in healthcare access, and the fact that all women, regardless of race, pay on average more for healthcare than men do, this disease is of real concern to us. We applaud the General Assembly and the Governor for creating a mechanism for greater understanding and prevention of this dangerous and painful condition.”

About the PCSW: The Permanent Commission on the Status of Women was formed in 1973 under Sec. 46a of the Connecticut General Statutes to study and improve Connecticut women's economic security, health and safety; to promote consideration of qualified women to leadership positions and to work toward the elimination of gender discrimination. As a non-partisan arm of the General Assembly, the agency monitors, critiques and recommends changes to legislation in order to inform public policy, and assesses programs and practices in all State agencies for their effect on the state's women. The PCSW serves as a liaison between government and its diverse constituents, and convenes stakeholders, including the business, non-profit and educational communities, local governments, and the media, in order to promote awareness of women's issues.
