Theaters stay afloat as nonposit

kids.

By Jim Zarroli

NEW YORK TIMES Nicki Wilson was shocked when her local newspaper reported in March 2023 that the Triplex Theater, an independent four-screen movie house in Great Barrington, Mass., was shutting down after almost three decades in business.

The Triplex, the only theater in town, was a much-loved fixture, attracting moviegoers from all around the Berkshires, even on winter nights when not much else was open, Wilson said.

"I couldn't imagine living in a town without a movie theater," she said.

Wilson was not the only one who felt this way, and after a community-wide campaign the Triplex reopened in November 2023 in a much different form. No longer is it dependent on ticket and popcorn sales. The Triplex has become a nonprofit organization relying on donations, grants, and plenty of volunteer labor. And instead of leaning on the next Hollywood blockbuster, the Triplex focuses on what the community wants

"In an independent theater, you can show what you want, said Gail Lansky, vice president of the Triplex's board. "You can show retrospectives. You can show foreign films. You can do film festivals. Free Saturdays for Certainly not all nonprofit theaters are doing well, but the model has worked, at least so far, in places like the Berkshires, where a devoted and well-heeled clientele is willing and able to support the arts. Two nearby nonprofit movie theaters in New York, the Moviehouse in Millerton and the Crandell Theater in Chatham, have attracted sizable fan bases. Across the country, more than 250 movie theaters are nonprofits, said Bryan Braunlich, executive director of the Cinema Foundation, a movie-industry group that provides research for cinemas.

"We are definitely seeing a trend of communities rallying around their local theaters," he said.

And movie theaters have needed saving. Since 2019, the the United States has declined 12 percent, to 36,369 as of 2023, said David Hancock, chief analyst in media and entertainment at the research firm Omdia. The popularity of at-home streaming over the past decade was a factor. Before the pandemic, audience numbers were already waning, but COVID-19 nearly dealt the industry a death blow.

"People certainly came back, but much more slowly," said the Triplex's former owner, Richard Stanley. "Ultimately, I saw the handwriting on the wall and decided I had to close."

When a theater shuts down in town, it is not just a problem for film buffs. Because of their unique architecture, with sloped floors and few windows, they are hard to convert to other purposes and often leave prominent spaces empty.

Becoming a nonprofit allows theaters to draw on different revenue sources, like film festivals, and the hope is that a theater catering to the people of a town will build a loyal and supportive

Fiscal watchdog keeps eye on state budget

ministration has sought to frame the increase as smaller, saying it would hike spending by 2.6 percent, but that doesn't include nearly $2 billion in socalled millionaires tax revenue she is proposing the state

"Last year, I think one of the real strengths of the budget was that it did endeavor to keep those costs at sustainable levels," Howgate said. "I think we see how challenging that is this year, but I think that that remains really important for longterm fiscal health."

Healey's budget proposal includes funding for transportation, housing, education, and child care. Howgate said that between the main budget proposal and supplemental budget, the hundreds of millions promised to the MBTA could eliminate 90 percent of its operating deficit in the next three years.

This structure provides some stability in the transportation system's funding for the next few years, and Howgate said he hopes it won't change with the budget now in the legislature's

Healey's proposals divvy up surplus funds from the Fair Share Amendment, often referred to as the millionaires tax, which raises state income tax on income above $1 million. The proposals split the funds evenly between transportation and education, which Howgate said the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation supports.

On the education side, Howgate said legislators should ensure surplus millionaire's tax revenue is used to cover onetime costs, not operating expenses, as the revenue is volatile vear-to-vear.

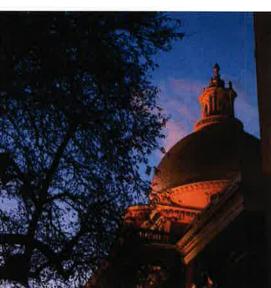

Jon Hurst, president of the Retailers Association of Massachusetts, said he hopes the state will cut property and payroll taxes, which are also costly for small businesses.

Some expressed concern about how the state will navigate uncertainty, hoping the state Legislature is prepared in case federal funding dwindles under President Trump.

"Uncertainty is always someing that creates a lot of co cern in the business community," Thomson said.

If federal funding shrinks, the state may need to find additional revenue sources. Phineas Baxandall, MassBudget policy director, said this could include implementing measures to prevent multibillion-dollar corporations from using offshore tax havens to avoid paying taxes in Massachusetts, which he said could add "hundreds of millions" to the state budget, or drawing from the state's rainy day fund.

"If we do have a federally brought-out rainy day," he said, "then we think it's appropriate to tap the rainy day fund towards addressing some of those shortcomings."

Associated Industries of Massachusetts is advocating for alternative standards to replace the MCAS, the exams state voters removed last year as a graduation requirement.

Spending, education, and baby bonds' are priorities

"There's nothing that's getting proposed that's going to make our state much better than what has been the last two years," he said. "So we're just trying to stop bad policies because they continue to just look at the bad policies and want to double down on them.'

Associated Industries of Massachusetts is pushing for alternative standards to replace the MCAS, the exams Massachusetts voters removed as a graduation requirement via ballot measure in November that many business leaders op-

Healey's proposed budget, supported by revenue from the Fair Share Amendment, would continue funding the Commonwealth Cares for Children program, which transitioned from pandemic relief money to state support last year, along with free community college and free school meals.

Massachusetts Budget and Policy Advocacy Director Chelsea Sedani said she hopes the Legislature builds upon victories like free community college with more support for community colleges and state universities to help them accommodate the additional stumentation.

She also has her eve cr. progress toward one of her organization's "long game" goals: baby bonds for children in the state's welfare and foster care systems - essentially, a savings-bond-like investment opened at birth that accumulates value over time for the child to access when they turn 18. Legislators considered this move last year, and a baby bond bill has been presented again this session.

We really see baby bonds as a way to address the racial wealth gap, to provide subsidized savings for children who wouldn't otherwise have the ability to accumulate wealth," Sedani said.

Health insurance costs remain a concern

more expensive

Hurst said some providers have pushed legislators to make state programs like Medicaid cover specialty treatments and new high-cost drugs, which leads to more people using them. Providers can then demand higher reimbursements, he said, leading insurers to raise premiums.

"Beacon Hill has listened to the specialty doctors, specialty providers, and big pharma far more than they have [listened to] small businesses, and it's cr∈- ated unaffordable medical inflation with no choices," he said. "The employee of the small businesses are locked in. The 're mandated. They don't have the choice that a large employer does to buy down and follow the ACA as opposed to state man-
