Guidance for Employers Regarding Immigration and Work Authorization
(Revised – April 2026)

The information contained in this document is provided for informational purposes only and should not be construed as legal advice. For legal advice, employers should contact qualified immigration or employment counsel.

General Guidance for Employers

Employers should understand that they need to be careful to navigate between two legal obligations:

1. Avoiding the employment of unauthorized workers, and
2. Avoiding discrimination, including discrimination based on national origin or citizenship status.

Employers cannot assume an employee or prospective employee is ineligible to work because, for instance, the employee/prospective employee is not from the United States, is from a particular country, has an accent, etc. In particular, employers should be careful not to assume that someone is unauthorized to work solely because they are dealing with immigration issues or have a temporary status, particularly when those matters are unresolved or subject to ongoing legal review.

Under the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA), it is unlawful for an employer to knowingly hire or continue to employ a person who is unauthorized to work in the United States. All employers must complete Form I-9, Employment Eligibility Verification, for each employee to document identity and work authorization. If an employee's work authorization is time-limited, employers must also reverify an employee's employment authorization before the expiration date. See 6.1 Reverifying Employment Authorization for Current Employees | USCIS

At the same time, the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) prohibits discrimination in hiring, firing, or recruitment based on national origin or citizenship status. See 8 U.S.C. § 1324b; 28 CFR Part 44. (There are some limited exceptions where required by law, regulation, or government contract.) Massachusetts law also provides additional protections against national origin and ancestry discrimination in employment under G.L. c. 151B, which applies to most public and private employers in the Commonwealth.

Termination of an employee because they may lose employment authorization in the future can be considered discrimination and generally should not occur. For employees on a temporary status, employers should explore and accept alternative work authorization grounds from alternative work statutes or provisions of law.

To ensure compliance with these overlapping obligations, employers should consult with an attorney to obtain advice regarding work authorization verification practices.

For more information on an employer's responsibilities to verify work authorization, please see USCIS: Handbook for Employers.

I-9 Audits

Employers should be aware of the increased possibility that federal officials may demand to inspect (or “audit”) their I-9s. Officials from the Department of Homeland Security, including Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the Department of Justice, and the Department of Labor have this authority. See Statutes and Regulations | USCIS. These officials should issue a written Notice of Inspection (NOI) at least 3 days before the inspection, though they may obtain I-9 forms without providing that notice if they have a subpoena or warrant.

Employers who receive an NOI, subpoena, or warrant for I-9 records should immediately contact attorneys who specialize in Immigration law. (See resources below). Legal counsel can help employers prepare documents, correct errors, and seek extensions. An employer may inform employees about the I-9 audit for purposes of transparency and orderly business operations. Please see the sample notice linked here: Template for Notice of I-9 Inspection | Mass Legal Services

A few additional points to understand are:

- The Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA) requires all employers to verify identity and employment eligibility for all hires, within three days of hire.
- Employers must verify employees’ I-9 documents in person unless they enroll in E-verify.
- Employers are subject to fines and other potential penalties (including criminal penalties) if they do not comply with I-9 rules.

Temporary Protected Status (TPS) & Work Authorization

Please note: TPS terminations are currently being litigated in multiple courts throughout the country. Due to ongoing federal court litigation, this status update may change, and the validity of employment authorization documents may shift as courts issue new rulings. Employers are strongly encouraged to seek out legal counsel specializing in immigration-related employment questions before taking any actions based on an employee's TPS status.

Employers are also reminded that an employee on TPS may still be authorized to work based on another status or provision of law and may provide other acceptable Form I-9 documentation to demonstrate employment authorization.

TPS for Haiti:

Although DHS acted to terminate TPS for Haiti as of February 3, 2026, a federal district court in Washington D.C. has stayed (paused) that action for now. See Miot v. Trump, CA No. 1:25-cv-02471, available at this link. The Supreme Court has kept this stay in place for now. This means that the protections and benefits of the TPS designation—including work authorizations—remain in place while litigation continues. Consequently, employment authorization documents associated with Haiti TPS, are automatically extended at least until the Supreme Court issues a decision on the case. See USCIS website: TPS Haiti.

Please note, the district court order in Miot v. Trump specifically preserves the right of all Haitian TPS recipients to continue working, as well as the protections of TPS against deportation. This order has full legal effect unless and until the Supreme Court stays or vacates the district court order.

This and other litigation on this topic are ongoing. Employers should check the USCIS website for updates on the litigation. The federal government has generally been updating this website with the latest court developments, although a short delay may occur.

TPS for Venezuela:

DHS has acted to terminate Venezuelan TPS for both the 2021 and 2023 designations. Whether or not a Venezuelan TPS holder can continue to work based on TPS-associated work authorization depends on the date on their work authorization cards (EAD) or I-797 “notice of action” receipts. See USCIS: TPS Venezuela

The date your employees' documents are now set to expire defines their validity (unless and until a court rules otherwise):

- Employees with an expiration date in April 2025 or September 10, 2025 on their EAD or I-797 notice of action cannot continue to work, unless ongoing litigation revives their claim for work authorization or they have an alternative status.
- Employees who received their EADs by February 5, 2025, with an expiration date of October 2, 2026 on their EAD or I-797 notice of action will retain EAD validity while litigation continues.

Please note: Litigation challenging the termination of Venezuelan TPS and related work authorization is ongoing, and Venezuelan TPS holders may hold alternative forms of work authorization. See National TPS Alliance, et al. v. Noem, et al. (N.D. Cal.) (Case 3:25-cv-1766). In this evolving landscape, it is important to understand your employee's unique circumstances prior to acting.

TPS for El Salvador:

TPS for El Salvador is set to expire on September 9, 2026. Work authorization for all El Salvadoran TPS holders was automatically extended to March 9, 2026, but TPS holders who filed a work authorization renewal application during the re-registration period of January 17, 2025, through March 18, 2025, may have received an extension of 540 days, which would be reflected on their Employment Authorization Document (EAD) or Form I-797C notice. When this extension ends may be affected by a recent provision of the One Big Beautiful Bill Act, but the extension is in any case valid until at least July 22, 2026.

For those employees who did not file for work authorization renewal, their work authorization based on El Salvador's TPS status likely expired on March 9, 2026.

TPS for other Countries:

TPS has been revoked for Afghanistan, Cameroon, Honduras, Nepal, Nicaragua, and Somalia. Each has various termination dates and potential litigation to expand those dates. For additional information on TPS-designated countries and current status, see the USCIS website.

Specific Information Regarding CHNV or CBP-1 App Parolees

Employers may also have employees with work authorization based upon their “parole” status, which is code C11 on the EAD card. It is important to know there are different types of “parole” status. The current administration has taken steps to revoke certain types of parole—such as Cuban, Haitian, Nicaraguan, and Venezuelan parole (CHNV) or CBP-1 App parole—along with any work authorization based on that parole. Importantly, the legal effect of these actions depends on the type of parole each employee has. The legal status of these parole revocations is in active litigation, including a recent case in the District of Massachusetts preserving parole status for CBP-1 App entrants. See Doe v. U.S. Dept of Homeland Security, Case 1:25-cv-12245-ADB, D. Mass.

Due to the complexities surrounding this type of parole revocation and ongoing litigation, employers should be careful about making any reverification decisions about parolees. Some parolees, and their associated work authorization, may remain valid, such as humanitarian parole.

In general, employers seeking answers about whether to reverify an employee with parole must not make assumptions about revocation and should seek legal counsel.

Other Immigration Work Authorized Statuses

In addition to the statuses described above, USCIS provides work authorization to potential employees such as asylees, refugees, recipients of deferred action and those applying to adjust their status to lawful permanent residence. Each of these temporary statuses has specific rules that allow for work, sometimes without requiring a work authorization card (e.g. refugees are authorized to work “incident to status” and can prove that eligibility through various documents other than an EAD card). When an employee indicates they are authorized to work but have an expired EAD card or another document purporting to show authorization to work, employers should consult the USCIS website to verify the employee's eligibility to work. See USCIS: Acceptable Receipts.

Final Note & Resources

In this evolving legal landscape, employers generally should:

- Maintain consistent and non-discriminatory I-9 practices;
- Avoid assumptions based on nationality or immigration status;
- Monitor USCIS information and updates about ongoing litigation; and
- Seek legal counsel about reverification or employment decisions based on TPS or parole-based work authorization.
