After my husband died, I couldn't bear to part with his car

As a recent widow, changing the registration felt like erasing my husband.

By Claire Curran-Balquist Updated July 10, 2025, 6:00 a.m.

"Behind the counter, the woman efficiently completes the transaction. Handing me the receipt, she suddenly reaches out and squeezes my hand. I try hard to remain stoic, but this simple act of human kindness penetrates the barricade holding back my emotions. The tears fall instantly.

Although I remain quiet, I feel my shoulders shake and my head lower. I stand frozen until I realize she has left her seat behind the window and come into the customer area. I have no recollection of how other customers may have reacted, but I do remember a hug and her young, sincere voice saying, "Grief has no time frame." She knew that today's transaction had little to do with a car."
